

The monopoly on violence breaks down -- a new order emerges

Wednesday, June 14, 2006 at 09:43 AM Comments: 20

Though several people thought I was too cynical or just some sort of fascist, it is as I said it would be -- when the monopoly on violence is broken, there is no government, and anarchy reigns.

Until, of course, a new government forms:

Angry residents living near the Douglas Creek Estates housing development occupied by aboriginal protesters say they'll protect their homes and families if the police won't.

Residents say the protesters are using tactics of aggression and intimidation along their backyards to bait Ontario Provincial Police into action, and so far the police response has been ineffectual.

A "resident response plan" has been circulated in the neighbourhood urging fearful homeowners to sound car alarms or horns "in the event a home or resident comes under attack."

Residents would then gather and confront the protesters to force them back onto the territory they have claimed.

This community group is essentially forming a government. They even have borders:

The plan calls for residents to "repel the aggression by creation of a large presence and advance together as one unit peacefully, if possible, until the offending persons remove themselves from the property and back into their own area."

David Hartless, author of the plan, said the intention is not to create vigilantes.

Residents would not pursue protesters past the "borderline" (yellow police tape), he said.

All they want is order and safety to be maintain in their area. If Premier Dalton McGuinty is unable or unwilling to maintain order, they'll do it themselves.

Of course, once they realize that they are providing for their own protection, these people might start to wonder just what exactly their taxes have been going towards.

Source: <http://stevejanke.com/archives/181635.php>